One of the poems, "A Soldier's Farewell to the Philippines," has more than passing merit about it. The last two verses are as follows:

Fall'n from thy high estate, thy once clear £aze
Has turned in retrospect to happier days;
And while the world around has thundered on,
Thy yesterday has seen no setting sun.
Thou art a giant, by tradition chalmed:
Thy strength is sapped, by long inaction drained.

When completed this can boast of having the finest cemey in the county.

Turn from thy vision of vain glories past, And from thy languid limbs the shackles cast:

Beat thou thy warlike, glitt'ring, gleaming creese
To prosy modern implements of peace;
And woo the favor of the bounteous soil By honest, steady, thrifty, trustful toil. Another little poem, with a real comic opera swing about it, is "The Belle of Sulu." It runs in this strain:

There's a beautiful Sulu belle, With a shapely, queenly head. There's a mystic spell in her eye gazelle, And her teeth are betel red.
